MILLAND HOUSE & PLACE

NOW A QUIET COUNTRY AREA, THIS WAS ONCE A BUSY INDUSTRIAL LANDSCAPE.

Like much of the Sussex Weald, Milland was once the location of a prosperous iron industry. Remnants of this era can still be seen around the private Milland House & Place.

To the east of the house you can see Milland Mill, a late 17th or three-storied building. The mill lake lies to the north of this building with the disused iron wheel on the east.

The stream running from Milland Place through the mill is called Hammer Stream, a name reflecting the old 'hammer' was a pond created to drive waterpowered forges and iron furnaces.

The proximity of Milland to London and the coast, with the existence of iron ore, charcoal and water, meant this now peaceful landscape was once overcome by the sounds and smells of the iron-making trade.

the narrower bridleway through the woods. At the end of the golf course turn right at the T-junction onto the track which bears right and descends to a road.

After Durrants Pond, turn left along Wardley Lane and continue for 1.4km until the tarmac ends (just beyond Robins Cottage).

Take the right hand branch where the track forks to climb Wardley Hanger. At the top of the hill continue straight ahead on the bridleway.
